REACHING OUT

- Talk Story health & SDOH assessment
- Build trusting relationships never extractive
- Overcome stigma, fear, and mistrust
- Protect agency and dignity
- Data in real time

“I was calling a patient to let her know her quarantine was over and so I wouldn't be checking in on her everyday anymore. Then the auntie asked me to turn on my video so that we could see each other's faces, so that when we saw each other after the pandemic was over, she could thank me, and we could give each other a hug. After I turned on my camera the auntie showed me all the pictures on her wall and told me about her family. And she is not the only one, there are so many people who are now a part of our 'ohana (family).”

Although stressful, the work we completed during the pandemic liberated our staff from many oppressive and extractive systemic practices. One CHW shared, “Now, when other organizations want to partner but they want us to go back to the old way – of only being so worried about counting and getting information from people – I’m not afraid to say, ‘No that’s not how we do it anymore.’” Instead, we have reconnected to KKV’s origin story, of staff knocking on doors to ask neighbors what they needed.

Carving our stories into each other the sayings of our grandmothers nurturing us

The ease of hearing what we desire when our own mouths utter the words

We are enough

We belong

on this edge of profound silence

a place who nourishes, loves, and forgives us

Words of healing

wrapping around

protecting us in the future

Finding strength in the challenge

Hands held in deep gratitude acknowledging that enduring in silence

no longer suites us understanding these connections are the most important to acknowledge

to create

to aim for
